

Health and Human Services Commission To Conduct Prescription Drug Misuse Prevention Town Halls

Prescription drug misuse has become a large public health problem in Texas and across the nation. Misuse may occur in people who need painkillers, sedatives or stimulants to treat a medical condition and can lead to addiction, and even overdose deaths.

For teens, it is a growing problem as well. One out of five Texas high school students have taken prescription drugs without a doctor's prescription at least once in their lifetime. The problem has resulted in increasing healthcare costs. In 2015, Texas had the second highest total healthcare costs from opioid misuse in the nation ($1.96 billion) and Texas is home to four of the top 25 cities in the U.S. for opioid misuse.

Because of the need for prevention measures related to the emergence of prescription drug misuse, the Texas Health and Human Services Commission (HHSC) is conducting regional Town Halls to discuss suggested best practices and solutions to prevent prescription drug misuse.

The Town Halls will be two to three hours in length. HHSC and local community representatives will make remarks and then ask for public comments and suggestions.

The ultimate goal is to develop a statewide strategic plan and community-based social marketing/public education plan to increase awareness of prescription drug misuse, the need for a coordinated approach, and promote increased use of Prescription Drug Monitoring Program (PDMP) data.

Groups who are encouraged to send attendees: youth; parents; business communities; media; schools/universities; youth-serving organizations; law enforcement agencies; religious or fraternal organizations; civic and volunteer groups; healthcare professionals; state, local or tribal agencies with expertise in the field of substance misuse; and other organizations involved in reducing substance misuse.
